The Honors of Hair Dressing.
The New Orleans lady correspondent of the St. Louis Globe thus writes to that journal about a recent terrible experience in the mysteries and miseries of hair dressing:

"We fashionable of New Orleans allowed a long time to elapse before we 'took' to the prevailing style of 'coiffure,' but now it is general, and on all sides a scraped woman is to be seen. Why, we are delighting now in showing the shape of the neck, which is seldom seen, simply because it is the fashion. Heavens! I would have made a cat laugh to have witnessed the hair dresser's first attempt at combing my mass of hair in the fashionable style. It took me days to make up my mind to undergo the operation, but at last I had to succumb to the fashion's demand and submit. An hour was appointed for her coming to give me a lesson, so that in the future I could dispense with her services. My return at length arrived, and I took the chair with a painful consciousness, that, somehow or other, she was going to make me resemble an unicorn. Not to be cast down during the important manipulations of my hair, I determined not to glance at the mirror until the business was completed. A most trying and heartrending resolve to carry out, all my sex will attest. But I bravely stood it, and never once peered into the tempting glass.

Well, she commenced operations; took down my hair, and then surveyed the length and thickness with rising wrath and asked me why. 'How in the world could she do up that mass?' With unusual weakness (for I was well aware she had no competency in her power) I replied, 'I don't know, but if you will stand on a chair you may accomplish it.' So she did. She stood on the chair, and raised my hair aloft, and it was really so ridiculous that we both yelled with laughter, until she pulled and scraped me to such an extent that I yelled with anger instead. I had much difficulty in restraining my passionate desire to throw the brush at her head; but after saying, 'Get thee behind me, Satan,' three times, I plied all my wits to be inclined to anger. I conquered the old well, as all things at last have an ending, my trial was over, and I was told to contemplate myself. I looked, and oh! ye sufferers like myself, the prophetic supposition was realized. I resembled a horned animal. Dumbfounded with wrath and horror, I gazed and gazed at my transfiguration. But I turned at last, with flashing eyes and hot words on my destroyer. The miserable woman calmly laughed, and said that I would soon be accustomed to it, and really I didn't look so bad after all. So bad! After days of anguish I have become accustomed to it, and the wonderful resemblance I no longer see. The horrid men hate the prevailing style of 'coiffure,' but as it is impossible to please them, their opinion is valueless. A few months ago they raved against the folly of wearing so much hair—of wearing it so low on the neck, and 'why didn't the women have sense enough to put their hair on their heads, so as not to soil their collars?' We have done it, and 'yet they are not happy!' A miserable specimen of the 'genious humor' asked me the other day, after hours of fatigue on my part in making my head as I supposed charming, 'where was my hair?' When I told him it was inside of my hat, he laughed 'merrily,' and wanted to know 'why we were any at all.' 'Wouldn't it be a great deal more comfortable to scrape it all off?' To his sarcastic remarks, I just annihilated him with a look of supreme contempt, then told him that if it was the fashion to scrape all my hair off I should certainly do so, but as it was not quite that yet his advice was entirely out of season. As I said before, it is impossible to please them, so we are not going to seek their approval any more, and instead, distrust one another. As we are all at fault, we will succeed gloriously.

One of my friends is running a race with me to see which of us will get our hair up the highest and smallest. I think I shall win, for I have a serious idea of undergoing an electric shock, so as to make 'each individual hair stand on end,' and then I shall certainly be able to accomplish the feat.

AN INTELLIGENT BLONDE.—Of the quality of intelligence which some of the fair seekers after legislative honors carry to the Capitol, you may judge from the words of a lovely blonde, elegantly attired, apparently about twenty-two or twenty-three years of age. 'Is Mr. Ames a member of Congress?' she inquired languidly of her near standing neighbor, a young New England woman of about her own age, stately and beautiful as a palm. 'Oh, yes,' said New England, with a sudden glance of astonishment. 'Well, I supposed so,' said the lovely maiden Washington. 'I knew Mr. Ames was [with the air of imparting information.] He is the man who had the difficulty with Sumner some years ago.'—Washington Correspondence of the Independent.
